Charge 2 sold arms to Amin

By VINCENT LEE
and MARCIA KRAMER

Two fugitive former CIA agents who reputedly have been heavily involved in foreign espionage and international gunrunning operations were indicted here yesterday on charges of illegally selling $138,000 worth of arms, ammunition, decoding gear and torture equipment to Idi Amin, then the dictator of Uganda.

The guns and torture equipment were delivered to the Ugandan Mission to the United Nations at 338 E. 45th St. at various times during 1979, according to the six-count indictment filed in Manhattan Federal Court.

Named in the indictment were Frank Terpil and George (Gary) Korkala, two former CIA agents who fled the country last year when prosecutors in New York and Washington started investigating their activities. Also indicted was Terpil's wife, Marilyn.

The three also were charged with conspiracy to secure Frank Terpil a false passport and foreign travel documents for Amir Momtaz, chief of protocol for the Shah of Iran.

Terpil and Korkala were last seen publicly two weeks ago when they were interviewed in a Beirut restaurant by CBS News for "60 Minutes." Two days after the show aired, the former CIA men mysteriously disappeared. Sources said they had been kidnaped by three Syrians, including one described as a "free-lance intelligence agent."

Amin was last reported living in Saudi Arabia.
